

Implementing new Business Systems is too hard

- If your business is not running as efficiently as it should.
- If you are losing clients due to dropping service levels.
- If you find costs are rising
- Staff are losing motivation to deal with problems without your constant guidance.

Then you have a chronic business problem.

The trouble with “Chronic” problems is felt by the fact that no single event will kill your business stone dead. But rather, like the owner of a hiatus hernia, you suffer the pains every day and tomorrow they will still be there and so will you.

It’s only when one of these issues becomes critical or acute that you will react. But, by then, it’s probably too late. A dull chest pain turns into a heart attack.

If you are employed in the company and your Boss summons you to his office. It’s probably too late.

If you run the business and the bank won’t let you make payroll. It’s too late.

If you leave your chronic business problem, without solution, for too long, the solution will cost more. But you just don’t have the time, budget, or energy to get into that now!
